Introducing the all-new 2019 Chevrolet Blazer, a stylish mid-size crossover prioritizing design over ruggedness. Positioned between the compact Equinox and the three-row Traverse, it targets the highly popular segment. Buyers can opt for high-tech driver assists and premium features, though top-tier models come at a price. The base four-cylinder engine lacks all-wheel drive, leaving the more powerful V-6 as the option for all-weather capabilities, quick acceleration, and towing prowess. The Blazer offers a distinct styling choice and an inspired driving experience, complemented by a spacious back seat and an excellent infotainment system.

While the name may sound familiar, this Blazer is an all-new vehicle. It has undergone various transformations since the 1960s, from a two-door SUV with a removable top to a compact SUV based on the S-10 pickup truck. Now, it emerges as a crossover SUV to fill the gap between the Equinox and Traverse.

Equipped with a standard 2.5-liter four-cylinder engine generating 193 horsepower, the Blazer may leave some underwhelmed for its size. The optional 3.6-liter V6, producing over 300 horsepower and capable of towing up to 4,500 pounds, is the more enticing choice. Inside, the Blazer offers a plethora of available equipment, including Apple CarPlay, Android Auto compatibility, adaptive cruise control, and forward collision mitigation.

The 2019 Chevrolet Blazer's Camaro-like styling certainly appeals as a style statement, but with numerous other five-passenger SUVs in the market, exploring other options might be worth your time. However, as a good used midsize SUV, it boasts good gas mileage, comfortable seating, user-friendly infotainment, and a variety of active safety features.
